The other side of the coin is basically when I have to go to another website, for example, you go to cnn.com and I may be on another topic. So the kind of ad that I have to click on is more of a cross marketing campaign. Whereas, an impression right now is a lot like a contextual campaign, but I am likely to go to another website. Camila Santamaria Camila Santamaria: That's right, and we're very excited about where Google analytics is going and what they are doing. Recently, they announced that they are going to automatically build a campaign in the next few weeks based on the fact that you were viewing a page of another website on your Google page. For example, if you are viewing a page of ESPN.com, it may help you to see more ads for ESPN sports and things like that. So it's definitely a new and dynamic shift that we're seeing in terms of the type of campaigns that are being built. Reed Ghazipour Reed Ghazipour: Yeah. So one of the biggest trends that are happening is around the social site, since we are seeing an incredible rise in the number of new publishers that are building their own social site. So for example, a great example is that Yahoo and Flixster recently announced a partnership to offer movie recommendations. So

What's New In AdBlock For Chrome?

Ad blocker for Chrome that blocks banners, pop-ups and offers on all websites using customizable filters. No-popup for Chrome No-popup is a Chrome extension that makes it easier to surf the Internet by hiding pop-ups and other annoying advertisements that would normally pop-up after you've clicked on something that has a link or a URL. It also lets you set up browser shortcuts that force No-popup to turn off all pop-up ads when you visit a new site. As soon as you install this extension, a new button appears on the browser toolbar, enabling you to easily activate or deactivate the feature. No-popup for Chrome Description: Add an extra button to the toolbar of your browser and make all popups vanish! Disable images automatically in Chrome This is a simple extension for Chrome that allows you to disable or enable images from websites. When activated, the browser removes the images when you click on a link that contains images, and doesn't display the images on websites in order to save bandwidth and CPU resources. It is designed to save a lot of band width, and since most websites use images for their navigation menu, having this addon turned on makes browsing the web more manageable, as it keeps you from having images loaded just because you wanted to visit a specific page. While the extension blocks all images on websites that are outside its own domain, it doesn't actually block images in sub-folders or sub-pages, nor does it limit the size of the images. Inactive images are automatically unloaded when you leave the website they're associated with or when the tab window is closed, so that they won't consume too much CPU resources when you leave the page. While images are being blocked, you will see a small gray overlay and a message explaining what's happening, and the button will display a warning when you reload the tab containing the blocked image or browse a new one. Disabling images for Google Chrome Description: Avoid the huge load of images from a website while you are reading it! Safari Extensions for Mac The popularity of Safari WebBrowser has been increasing over the last few years, while its use has become more and more common. According to the latest statistics, it can be found on 98 percent of the desktop computers currently in use. Another interesting fact is that, unlike Google Chrome, Safari only has very little extensions and add-ons out there, thus making the browser much
