Lightroom has always offered Photoshop-ready files that allow the crop, boost, and effects engine to use the information it needs to do its job. In recent versions of Lightroom, the need to manually change Raw settings has also been eliminated. This was an excellent step and it's a welcome improvement given cameras that record Raw files. For example, I now have a single folder with all my Raw files. All I need to launch is the file that corresponds to the different settings I want to apply to the images. But, just like its older brother, Photoshop is not ready for the digital age. I don't think I have ever been able to spend long enough in Photoshop to see the same information available system-wide. Yes, the program now has the same video and graphics editing features as The Foundry's Nuke Express. Adobe has even brought in Panorama Creator, which allows users to stitch photos together in a similar fashion. And users can also image exchange PSD files with their friends. However, Photoshop still needs additional features to be able to provide something similar to Nuke Express. Let's start with the most basic ones. I can already crop and select layers, but can I fill my picture in? The stock images in Photoshop are not large enough to fulfill the need so I need to crop them. More importantly, this is the only Photoshop feature that relies on a camera toolkit. I cannot flip or slide a camera, so no undo after cropping and selecting layers. Even the new Change Crop tool doesn't have any of the tools you ask for while playing around with a photo.
