Renal angiomyolipomas (AML) are benign mesenchymal neoplasms of the kidney. The risk of rupture and hematuria is higher in pregnancy. We report a case of a pregnant woman with an AML measuring 15 × 12 × 10 cm in the right kidney. The patient did not have a history of tuberous sclerosis. A multidisciplinary approach was used for the management of this large AML. We performed enucleation of the tumor. The resection was performed using a combination of monopolar diathermy and harmonic scalpel and complete resection was performed. A normal and uneventful postoperative course was achieved. A large AML was found in a patient with Pregnancy-associated protein-associated protein-associated (PPAP) polycystic kidney disease. Although a large AML during pregnancy can be managed conservatively, open surgical resection offers the advantage of complete resection.Q: How do you choose the content of a Technology Stack Overflow? The 3-stack is designed so the top 3 content areas of Stack Exchange can generate traffic to each other (the main Stack Exchange homepage, Meta Stack Exchange, and the trilogy of sites on the Stack Exchange Network). But how do you choose what type of content should be the "top" content for a site? Does it simply come down to the views you want (answers, questions, etc.)? Is it purely based on engagement? A: There

There are three specific aims of this program: 1) to provide the highest quality training in an area of internal medicine research at the postdoctoral level; 2) to develop a core group of physician scientists in academic medicine with a research focus in the area of internal medicine; and 3) to enhance the research training of residents and medical students through the development of an interactive clinical research education program. The program has been developed and is being implemented by a group of talented and committed faculty who have a history of successful training in academic medicine. The trainees complete a basic research apprenticeship with one of the faculty mentors in their respective field, and acquire state-of-the-art research skills in a protected environment through participation in a variety of seminars, journal clubs, and courses. The research experience and the development of grant-writing skills are emphasized in the three major fields of internal medicine research. Trainees choose either the subspecialty of cardiology or the subspecialty of nephrology for the core period of their training, with exposure to clinical practice in both subspecialties. Each of these fields is comprised of a large group of faculty that span multiple departments and many subspecialties. Thus, the program is designed to foster interactions between basic, clinical, and translational investigators and to expose trainees to new areas of research. The training in the setting of an academic medical center provides an outstanding environment for the development of the career of the trainees. In addition, the program is designed to provide an excellent forum for the training of medical students and residents in the conduct of clinical research. The most recent trainees have an excellent track record of subsequent research publications. A committee of outstanding basic and clinical faculty monitors the program to ensure that the goals are being achieved. Over the f988f36e3a
