Consequently, biologists want to study the behavior of bacteria when they are confined to nanoscale volumes. The work of the Villanueva-Chavez group at the University of Arizona has led to a new understanding of how cells change their behavior and communicate with one another when they are confined in conditions that their entire environment is nanoscale. “Confinement of cells can stimulate their surface to become functionalized with proteins that interact with and respond to specific molecules in the environment,” said Edmonds, also an associate professor of physics at the University of Arizona. “This can lead to a higher level of complex biological activity that is not observed when bacteria are grown in bulk solution.” The research group is studying Staphylococcus aureus—often called staph or staphy, a member of the “superbugs” that are becoming an increasingly common cause of hospital infections. The pathogen is an important contributor to hospital-acquired infections, which are a growing global problem. S. aureus—and a related pathogen called Staphylococcus epidermidis—are responsible for between 75%
