Grief, Hope, and God's Best for Me If you have children in your home, you have undoubtedly seen other people's children. You know the differences. Their voices, their speech. You know your own children can be so different than other children. You know how your child learns differently than other children. That doesn't mean, however, that you don't care and love your own children. You do. When they are happy, so are you and so is your family. When they are sad, so are you and so is your family. When they are sick, so are you and so is your family. But, do you know yourself well enough to know who else in your home learns differently than your own children? If you are like many mothers, and me, it is possible you don't know that your own child learns differently than the other children. You don't need a different education. You don't need a different training program. You need to figure out why your own child learns differently from the other children. Here are some things to think about: 1. Are you conscious of the way your child communicates? Are you aware of your child's language and what it means? Do you realize how vocal your child is, how much he talks? Are you aware of your child's attention span? Are you aware of his natural curiosity? Are you aware of your child's need to play out his life experiences for another person? Are you aware of what it takes for your child to listen? Are you aware of your child's mind and how he thinks? Do you know the difference between your child's knowledge and your child's opinions? If not, why not? 2. If your child is slow to learn, does she need more attention, more time, or more lessons? Is your child slow to learn because she does not wish to hear what she is not ready to understand? Or, is she slow to learn because she does not speak? 3. What is the
