the amount of effort you put into your survival may vary from another, for sure, but this cannot be avoided. in a natural disaster you should be the first to put all your effort into surviving and ensuring the safety of your friends, and then to help others to do this as well. it is a good idea to start with building a shelter in a separate minecraft world before you leave your current world. in many ways it resembles the community servers for other popular games. you can use this separate world as a safe haven and defense when surrounded by a hostile area, and perhaps as a base of operations when things are safe. it has been said that nature is indifferent, but how often have you heard that this is not true? of course, there are some natural disasters that are practically unavoidable, e.g. a big earthquake, a landslide, a volcano, and a tsunami. however, other natural disasters may be avoided, if there is enough warning time.

as a last resort, the last thing you should do is try to fight the waves. the damage inflicted by tsunamis is not proportional to their amplitude, but is a nonlinear function of the amplitude. thus, if you are not prepared, even if you are in a place where they cannot reach you, a big wave might kill you and your companions. it's a good idea to use your wad (or the rewad, if you're a modder) to test your impact radius. in short, users who agree to the terms and conditions are sent an in-game message which requires them to enable an incoming connection in the server settings, from which they can download the virus. if the message was not removed, it would infect the user's computer and take their money. the only options the server administrator has are to report the user or to not check the message.
