I used to get frustrated that I couldn't upgrade my tools, but I found it a relief that upgrades can arrive at any time, even though that's not good for system performance. I used to have to visit Photoshop site to install updates when they became available, and they could take a couple of hours. I never noticed the details, because the actual process of updating is probably so fast that I didn't even notice when a new

I have been using LR since version 4 and I use it to edit raw files for a living. Once I made the leap to Photoshop CS5 (which I really wanted to avoid), I was impressed by the improvements. I continually keep up with the development versions to see what new features they added and have been fairly satisfied with the performance of the latest build.

For images like this I use a program called DxO Know II, a type of lifestyle lens that you can find at your local photo store. It's designed to let you adjust the optimal amount of "AS" (Adaptive Sharpening). Lower your image quality to 75 in the Levels tool. You can also reduce the red and blue tones to make the skin have a darker tan color. In the palette, duplicate the "luminance" table and also duplicate the "red" and "green" color tables. Set the "gamma" to 2.744. This gives you a bit of a boost to the darkness of the skin. If you attach a lightbox to your camera, you'll be able to check the difference of your Photoshop editing work more easily. In the "Components" palette, resize the "Background" layer down to around 50 pixels. When you increase the resolution, it'll affect the resolution of your image, which are less carefully-crafted photos and, thus, they look blurrier. You can use a virtual lightbox to see the side effects of the editing. Anytime you edit a photo, a preview screen will load and if you click on it, it will show you the image without losing your previous edits. You'll need to either move your images to another folder like a sub-folder of "October", or move them to a location that requires additional software (like Time Machine) to backup. Click on the Select menu bar at the top of the window with the image preview to select the image you want to work on.
