Adobe Photoshop Lightroom for iPad Pro, now called Lightroom for iPad Pro, is the platform's first major redesign since a major version arrived on Macs a few years back. After being filled with sensible improvements since day one, I feel that Lightroom for iPad Pro really feels like a very well-made, solid, stable, and high-quality application. If you're using Lightroom 5.x for Mac or Windows, this update will be a no-brainer upgrade for you to make it work better with your iPad Pro. Update at your own peril, but if you've really wanted to leapfrog your Mac or Windows program to the future, it's now possible without having to abandon Lightroom. There's merely Medium format support, Live Photos, and a few extra save locations. But if you want to start a project with your iPad Pro, you'll have to save it in the cloud, and there's no other way around. If you want to run it offline, you can. If you want to have auto-import of PSD files triggered by new events in your system—such as startup or after file editing, then I highly recommend it. If you need to do some computing after import, and deal with defect JPEGs, as well as managing the way Adobe interprets filepaths to prevent problems with file nesting—then I highly recommend it. I've tried all of the various Adobe syncing options under Windows 7 and it never seems to want to sync my Lightroom catalog files. I have a Mac and use that for my daily editing. I mostly use my Windows laptop for web design work, but I need Lightroom to work on the images that I work on. It is really annoying and I just put up with it.

The creative minds on the Lightroom Team spent years creating options in the adjustment layers panel that simulate adjustments in film, black & white and sepia tones. The color adjustment layers are used to simulate the effects of different film types on your image. Effect filters such as Lightroom's orange filter create an oospheric, blue-toned look in an image for the times when a color cast is just desired. e3d0a04c9c
