Craig Stephen Hicks was convicted last week on one count of second-degree murder, three counts of attempted murder, first-degree assault and other charges, all of which stemmed from the shooting of two black men in a parking lot in an Orlando suburb, months before the killings of nine black parishioners during a Bible study at the historic Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church. It was considered the deadliest attack on an American church in at least four decades. On Thursday, a jury found the 43-year-old a convicted killer at the Orange County Circuit Court. Jurors deliberated for roughly 12 hours over three days. Hicks was convicted for the 2009 murder of DePayne Middleton Doctor, 50, and Bryon Russell, 43, who were shot in a white Honda while it was parked in a church lot. Prosecutors argued that Hicks had plotted an attack that killed the men because they were part of a "black-on-white hate crime" at the church, where he was a congregant. Hicks' lawyer, Howard Finkelstein, argued that his client had acted in self-defense, and that his attack was the product of his bipolar disorder. Finkelstein said that Hicks had attended the church as recently as September 2009, and that his own black attorney had advised him to stop going. Finkelstein argued that an idea started by Hicks to start a "race war" among Christians had turned into a decision to start a "race war" in the parking lot of a church. "This was a planned attack," Finkelstein said. He said that Hicks believed he could get a "revenge" by shooting the men and still leave the parking lot
