Stéphane dans Test de grammaire DELF B1; Ewa dans Test de .Peritumoral mast cell accumulation in squamous cell carcinoma: correlation with survival. Peritumoral mast cells have been reported to correlate with a poorer prognosis in malignant melanoma and breast cancer. To test this observation for squamous cell carcinoma (SCC) of the head and neck, mast cells were quantified in histologic sections of stage I and II SCC of the oral cavity. Mast cell density was assessed in primary tumors and regional lymph nodes from 69 patients with previously untreated, clinically node-negative, stage I and II SCC. All patients received a transthoracic dissection, and tumor, nodes, and mast cells were submitted for histologic examination. Peritumoral mast cell density was estimated per x40 field in 20 randomly selected fields of the tumor and nodes. Overall survival was analyzed using the log-rank test and Cox proportional hazards regression. Two hundred fourteen patients with normal-appearing cervical lymph nodes were available for additional survival analyses. Only 26% (n = 17) of stage I tumors were found to have high mast cell density, and 57% (n = 11) of stage II tumors were found to have high mast cell density. Mast cell density was not related to primary tumor size or stage or to nodal involvement or histologic grade. Mast cell density tended to be higher in stage I tumors that relapsed (n = 8) compared with stage I tumors that did not recur (n = 7), but did not reach statistical significance. Patients with stage II tumors that relapsed (n = 6) showed a significantly higher mast cell density (P = .04) compared with stage II tumors that did not recur. Peritumoral mast cell densities were not associated with time to recurrence or survival among stage I and II patients. Peritumoral mast cell density did not correlate with survival and was not independently associated with time to recurrence. Future studies should determine whether mast cell infiltration is prognostic of recurrence in early
