Photoshop is built on a layer-based editing system. Layers are, as the name suggests, an imaginary layer on top of an existing layer. The image data for a single layer is contained in a separate file. The first thing you want to do in Photoshop is to make a new document — a blank canvas. The main screen of Photoshop, as shown in Figure 5-3, opens to a blank canvas and is the first thing you see when you start. You can import images from a variety of places, including from a camera. To import photos, follow these steps: 1. Import the photos you want to work on into the photo editor. Image data are often stored on the memory card in a file format such as JPG, TIFF, or RAW. You may need to format your memory card or hard drive and rebuild your image directories (which contains the files on your memory card). 2. Use the File⇒Import command. On the Mac, click Import at the top of the menu bar and then click Import from. On Windows, double-click the Import button in the upper left corner of the window. After a few moments, a window appears, as shown in Figure 5-4. 3. Click your memory card or hard drive.

However, GIMP is not as powerful and capable as Photoshop. Pixelmator is a lightweight and powerful image editor. It is a cross-platform tool. However, there are some limitations compared to Photoshop. It doesn't support common features like layers, masks and intelligent red-eye removal. Pixelmator is known for its speed and efficiency in editing images. Pixelmator Magic Wand Each of them has some other features that are unique to them. That's why you need to choose the best software to edit images in order to save time and keep the image quality. Before you begin editing images, you have to keep in mind what type of image editing is required. Here is a list of the most common image editing tasks:

Red Eye Removal Removing red eye is important because red eyes are especially glaring in images. Red-eye is created when a flash of light from the camera lens reflects in the person's eyeball. Red-eye removal is done using the Spot Healing Brush and/or other brushes in Photoshop. These photo editing software has inbuilt tools to allow removing red eyes. You have to find the red eye, select it, and then click the eye icon in the toolbar. This selection tool will hide the other eyes on the photo.

Adjusting Levels The Levels tool allows adjusting the image brightness. You may need to increase the brightness to make a photo brighter, or decrease the brightness to make it darker.

Saving Images Photos can be stored in different file formats like JPG, TIFF, GIF, BMP, TGA. You can save the edited image in the same file format.

Splitting Images You can split a single image into multiple images. This is useful when you need to resize multiple photos. You can use the Image>Split Tiled command for it.

late-onset condition frequently associated with chronic kidney disease (CKD), but little is known about risk factors for kidney damage in childhood obesity. We determined whether glomerular filtration rate (GFR), cystatin C, and glucose and lipid metabolism markers are associated with kidney damage in children with and without obesity. We included 81 children fat mass percentage >85th percentile, CKD was defined as >10% below GFR predicted (based on age, gender, and height), and kidney damage was defined by abnormal (>90th percentile) cystatin C. Glomerular filtration rate and the composite cystatin C/GFR were higher in obese children ( $0.73 \pm 0.18$  ml/s/m2) versus  $0.60 \pm 0.20$  ml/s/m2,  $P = 0.007$  and  $0.83 \pm

Just a few days ago, Mozilla added a new tab to the Firefox web browser that is designed to show a simple, visual measurement of how energy efficient each site on the web really is. SEE: The Top 100 Most Inefficient Web Sites The feature is part of the company's broader 10 Energies initiative, which is about taking small steps to improve the environment, and in this case, Mozilla is measuring how much energy it takes to display a given page in the browser. Users get a sticker on the side of the browser with a green, yellow or red rating for each website they are visiting -- and the ratings are based on how much energy a site is consuming in terms of kilowatts (or kiloWatts). To get the energy score for a given site, the browser first measures what percentage of the webpage's content can be rendered by the user's computer. If the website is not responsive (and most are not), then the browser does not render anything on the screen. The browser then measures the power used by the website itself. If the website's code is not written to be as energy-efficient as possible (i.e. consuming less power), then the site will consume more energy. One of the major reasons Mozilla is doing this is because its browsers are used by more than 80 percent of the world's population. If you're wondering how many people use your browser, the company estimates 2.4 billion people use Firefox today. For now, the feature is only a part of the Firefox browser, but Mozilla is considering adding the metric to other parts of its ecosystem, including its Firefox OS mobile device and the upcoming Firefox Marketplace for Chrome OS devices. SEE: The Top 10 Things Everyone In The Office Should Stop Doing Mozilla said that it started the 10 Energies project to encourage users to adopt greener habits on the web and that more energy efficient sites will get a lower energy score. "We're not trying to force any one thing on users; we're trying to help people learn about these things and make informed choices," Kevin Lynch, Mozilla's chief innovation officer, wrote in a blog post. The Top 100 Most Inefficient Websites as ranked by 10 Energies. Image: 10 Energies. "We've seen over and over how making small changes can have a big impact and, combined with the 10 Energ
