Summary Introduction Before heading into a test lab, C&C wouldn’t want the entire Fantasy Grounds community to see any flaws we’ve overlooked along the way. That’s why we keep an eye on gameplay feedback so that we can improve the game before its release. But we’ve made all the changes we recommend or wanted to make, and we’re ready for beta testing. Q: Should I think about business in Roles and Managers rather than Tasks? I've noticed that in the past my thinking was very Task focused so I wasn't using the Roles and Managers provided by TFS. However after talking with a colleague he suggested that by making sure I have a clear understanding of my unique technical responsibilities I can get more creative with what my responsibilities are. So should I base all of my thinking on Roles and Managers and if it's not so do I get as much out of TFS as I could? A: Should I get more creative? Yes Should I base my thinking on roles and managers? Yes for larger organisations or for organisations seeking to foster a more "dev" work culture. The more mundane business of project planning, manageable changes and community building are often lost or clouded in a more project centric work culture. This has a flip side of course.
