A new group of early-diverging birds called scansoriopterygians is known to have possessed a set of long feathers on the tail but were otherwise wingless, further reinforcing the traditional subdivision of the Neoaves into a clade that later split into two groups: The gruiformes (e.g., turkey, chicken, pheasants, etc.) and the neognaths (e.g., herons, cranes, hawks, etc.). Here we use complete mitochondrial DNA (mtDNA) sequence from the same genus (Dryolestes plus Neochen and little egret, and in some cases e.g., white-throated sparrows) to describe a new group of birds called justinids, from the vernacular of the McIntosh Lab (Charles McIntosh, an avian paleontologist at the American Museum of Natural History in New York). The first known justinids lived during the early Late Cretaceous (~105 million years ago) about 45 Mya, and are morphologically very similar to the scansoriopterygians, but all are described as having only two plumage regions: A short, stiff-looking, purple-brown tail, and a very long, plumelike, gray-white tail that is fully feathered over its length. Our data show that the scansoriopterygians were not descended from, but rather, were the earliestdiverging surviving relatives of the justinids, and strongly suggest that the scansoriopterygians were actually broader-based and long-bodied, but that this feature was lost in the justinids. This result is supported by a novel PCR-based system for coding the amino acids present at key positions of the amino acid backbone of small peptides, which
