Most of the so-called hackers and crackers offer a set of services to perform various exploits on the target systems. They may offer a full-fledged hacking services for a one-time fee or a subscription model (comprising of different time periods). You'll have to give the standard per hour rate then extra charges for other things like a remote desktop connection, decrypting SSL/TLS certificates, network connectivity and firewall configuration. You can also expect the hackers to provide data on how many times the tool successfully executed against the target, a detailed analysis, and post-exploitation report including issues found on the target server. Once the hacker has obtained a high level of access to the targeted system, they can install software to perform the rest of the damage. They might use the software to scan the network and change the settings on all of the machines on the network to perform targeted attacks. For example, they might use the software to locate and delete sensitive data. Once the hacker has gained access and control over a system, they're in a position to do a lot of damage. In this vast market you will find low-level hackers, mid-level hackers and high-level hackers. Some offer basic hacking services, while others are expert crackers who could be hired to perform highly specialized hacking operations. You will also find low-cost crackers, who, for example, could be hired to perform some basic exploits and return the damages. When we're looking at costs, we break our operation into bite-sized pieces, which allows our customers to plan their budgets without any surprises. There's an overall cost for each attack that includes the time, tools, travel and work-space needed for each attack. However, we factor in the overhead for our entire operation, from the employees who operate the business to the systems we use to perform the attacks. This allows our customer to see not only the hourly rate, but also the full cost associated with hiring an ethical hacker.
