Nexon. Enjoy the game. I'm still playing it, but it's not going any further - it's annoying. And it's expensive. Yes, I have problems getting by too. BUMP: I've actually managed to make it to level 35. I don't think I'll play any more, though. I spent too much time over-investing. Looking ahead: * Game does nothing for me. I was hoping for a sequel, but it looks like it's already decided on what to be. * Newer games do *something* interesting with the time mechanic. They get you playing the game over and over, and on and on for a few hours. You get to the point where it feels amazing when the timer counts down to zero. * I like how other games play differently. For example, Panoramabot is *way* too easy to beat on normal. And then I beat it *twice* in a row. * I don't mind playing on a character that I've leveled *before* now. I was afraid to do that on the original game. NOTES ON THE GAME * I like how everything I do counts as an "action". This affects your stats and the time remaining. * "Action Points" give you x% chance of success at each act. Not sure if this applies to loot in dungeons too. * (level 20) I found two drow in the game's map. I sent them a request to cut down a tree. When I went back, the other drow had cut down the tree too. I think they had been waiting for me to take care of the place, and then they could come in and use the furniture. I haven't been able to find that tree a second time. * Battle is the standard classic turn-based. You can attack when you want. * Weapons and armor can be changed at any time. * It's possible to change every piece of armor in the game. * Mana potions are limited. Don't drink them all. * I think the item drop is supposed to be split between average and better items. * Battle appears to only last for 20 turns. * I didn't notice any way to heal myself. * Some games, like "Aion", let you restart/save at bff6bb2d33

Microalgae are defined as organisms that are able to photosynthesize. Microalgae are known for containing the highest concentrations of protein, lipid, and carbohydrate of any types of algae, including macroalgae. In fact, microalgae have been known to provide nutritional supplements to humans since prehistoric times. Most microalgae are adapted to live in pure culture. In nature, however, microalgae typically live in a heterogeneous environment where other species compete for the same limited nutrients, light and the like. As a result, microalgae have developed features that permit the rapid proliferation of a single cell and the survival of the microalgae when competing with other species. In nature, microalgae grow in a variety of temperatures, pH levels, and salinity ranges. In the search for better environmental conditions that provide the right nutrients, light, and the like to sustain microalgae, chemists have modified microalgae to obtain the desired characteristics of microalgae. The availability of oxygen is critical to the survival of microalgae because the conversion of the energy stored in their cellular components requires molecular oxygen. The ability of microalgae to use carbon dioxide as a source of energy is also critical. Microalgae have been cultured in the laboratory and in industrial scale plant operations to produce biomass, lipids, oil, pigment, and the like. For example, microalgae have been modified to produce and accumulate large quantities of oil and protein to provide environmentally friendly biofuels for transportation and the like. The microalgae Chlorella sp. and Spirulina sp. are often cultured on a large scale in the United States for oil and protein production. These microalgae are able to grow well in a large
