ability to control Photoshop in real time using Apple's CoreMIDI and Keyboard Events. That means you can mash up the color, brightness, saturation, or other editing methods in real-time on images while you're photographing. The new document panels provide more context for what's going on. To build a new document, walk to File | New or press the new key on the top left of the window. You can also press CMDN to toggle the view to the standard Photoshop window or to a Workspace with your open documents. The newly created document opens in the standard Photoshop window or in a totally different panel, depending on the view. The primary panel is the Photoshop window with the huge tool palette at the bottom. It's also the place to see all your open documents. As a shortcut, you can use the tab key to open the workspace with your open documents, which opens in the background. With any app, pressing tab will always open the last app that used the keyboard. With Photoshop, pressing tab with the new document picked will open Photoshop in the background. Pressing tab with a document opened loses focus from the document and returns you to the primary workspace. When Photoshop freezes or you move the mouse off the application window, pressing tab will open the last app that was active, the default being Photoshop.

With the introduction of Photoshop CC 2019 and earlier the Adobe Camera Raw (Version 9) release, Adobe Camera Raw (Version 9) and Photoshop CC 2019 introduce a new rendering engine, which will be shipped in the next release. This new rendering engine is being adopted across all of Adobe's applications. The new rendering engine will increase Photoshop's performance and extend the life of the application. There is minimal impact to users, as the native Photoshop rendering engine remains in use. However, over time, performance will be improved and the ability to compile the application for the new rendering engine will be a possibility, once new releases of the application are available.
