By guaranteeing that a valid inquiry could go unanswered by introducing maximum, the right-to-reply was a way to expose the hypocrisy of moneyed interests whose undue influence pervades the public sphere. No doubt those who defended the right-to-reply worried about the way it would be used to attack journalism. But in the end, the worry about unwanted political influence was nothing but a figment of the right-to-reply's detractors' imagination. The ___ Machine Supporters of the right-to-reply assumed that once it was established and populated by reporters and citizen journalists, there would be no abuse. But the genie was already out of the bottle. Irrespective of the dangers the right-to-reply posed to journalism, it was already crumbling under the weight of its own contradictions. First, the right-to-reply is based on the notion that we have a democratic obligation to respond to inconvenient questions. Yet in practice, the right-to-reply has always been directed at those who have won political power. As in the era of Barack Obama, when the White House failed to respond to the emerging narrative that the president was born in Kenya, the right-to-reply was first established as a tool against inconvenient political figures, not journalists. The lack of a legitimate answer will continue to drive the use of the right-to-reply for reasons other than the protection of the public sphere. The right-to-reply is already being used to attack journalists whose inquiries are inimical to a
