products touting the many ways to enjoy the tasty morsels of the vegetable kingdom, from snack-size bags of toasted crickets to small jars of frankenworm (yes, it's technically named after its two favorite foods, sausage and eggs). Much of the worm appeal comes from the fact that these little critters are naturally high in protein and easily digestible, and while they're not likely to replace farmed animals as a protein source, they can still be very helpful in terms of dietary variety. But lately I've been thinking about something else: how worms might affect the worm 0cc13bf012 naturalistic treatment of adults diagnosed with chronic tinnitus with an unconventional sham-tape self-masking tinnitus device.

Tinnitus can be life-altering and debilitating. Many people with tinnitus find relief by wearing a hearing aid or a device to mask the noise; however, one of the challenges with using these devices is the unpleasantness of the masking. A researcher set out to identify alternative nonsurgical masking devices to test the efficacy of such a device on tinnitus relief. This study describes a clinical evaluation of a self-masking tinnitus device (SMTD). The SMTD was compared with hearing aids on phantom sound awareness (PSA) and tinnitus distress scores (TDS) in adults with tinnitus, tinnitus severity, and hearing loss.
