The .The problem of alkali metal addition to CO2 and other hydrocarbon substrates is well known in the field of coal liquefaction and other hydrocarbon conversion. Processes are known which use alkali metal amides as activators for the catalytic conversion of hydrocarbons to a variety of products, including, among others, gasoline and motor fuels, chemicals and olefins. Alkali metal amides are superior to alkali metal alkoxides in these processes due to their low ignition temperatures. It is known that alkali metal amides are most easily formed from alkali metal alkoxides and ammonia in the presence of a solvent. The most commonly used solvent is water and the most commercially common amides are lithium and sodium amides. It is also known that sodium amides and lithium amides are stable at temperatures of about 400.degree. C. when catalytically effective. It is also known that catalytic amide formation has heretofore been carried out at temperatures in the range of about 250.degree. C. to about 400.degree. C. With a temperature of 250.degree. C. the reaction is not complete at a reaction time of greater than about 10 minutes and with a temperature of 400.degree. C. the amides decompose at a reaction rate which is too high for a commercially useful catalytic conversion. Attempts to lower the reaction temperature to about 200.degree. C. have resulted in a drop
