Using too little scene canvases for portraits depends upon the size of the person photographed. For example, a 6x6 can be cut in half and each arm or hand can be half-sized, reducing the actual size of the canvas that should be used. A further disadvantage to using too small of a canvas is that the arms and hands will appear too large and unrealistic and unrealistic hands and feet are usually associated with the portrait.

Using too large of a canvas is more of a disadvantage. In this case the head is cut off and again, more realistic looking limbs and hands are associated with larger canvases. I also concur with the original statement that a nice backdrop is more important than the size of the canvas. However, I don't always agree that, Sometimes my clients have special requests and want a large canvas print, but I understand what they are after. For example, a large pizza box can be used as a backdrop. By using a large pizza box and cutting some of it off, the head and shoulders can be kept at the correct proportions. The large pizza box sets the scale for the portrait. Problems with using small canvases is that it leads to un-realistic proportions for the head and the arms and hands. When the canvases are too small, I rarely recommend that a portrait be photographed indoors. The bedroom is too dark for any decent portrait. For a portrait taken over a black background we want to see the head of the model. The sky should be just a dome or overcast. Ideally, we want clear skies for a portrait so that the arms and hands can be given some dimension. As a very rough guide, recommend using a 16x20 backdrop where there is a minimum of 6' between the backdrop and the model.
