With Lightroom 5, you'll be able to enjoy quick previews of RAW files when selecting them in a catalog. If you're in the habit of culling images directly from your camera card, then this may come in handy. Lightroom is now capable of integrating the latest available camera firmware on a Nikon D5 and D500. This is crucial for Lightroom to operate properly and, thus, the latest firmware is essential. The firmware update feature remains a mild recommendation, though. The firmware must be downloaded from Nikon's website before it will even be mirrored in Lightroom. Some time will be spent downloading, so the firmware upgrade will not be instantaneous. It may appear that Lightroom does not support the latest firmware, but that is incorrect. Lightroom does support the latest firmware v2.0 on the D5 and D500, the current version on the market. You can then download it from Nikon's website. Lightroom is here as it is today. It is not a bad thing, and it does have its own quirks. But most of Lightroom's quirks can be addressed through its strongly configurable options, which are primarily found in the Lightroom preferences. The preferences can of course be accessed from inside of Lightroom. The preferences are mostly placed in the Windows Start Menu shortcut (in this case, the Start Menu shortcut has no persistent menu). And we've changed the way that our Adobe Lightroom Windows Gallery shows screenshots. The end result is that the Gallery is now faster to open. I haven't noticed any performance issues or anything else that should have been improved in Lightroom, although I can't say for sure that there's nothing that needs fixing. The new interface is a little bit easier to use as well. I still think it would be beneficial for Adobe to fix the gallery, though. The one with the detailed indicator light.
